Be an agent of change

Encourage transformation.

Lawyers are in unique positions to initiate change, to advocate for medical treatment over traditional sanctions and to refer individuals to appropriate help. Clients are more apt to discuss these issues with their lawyers and lawyers are in a better position to advise and protect their clients' interests.

The ability to demonstrate to the court that your client is taking the proper steps to address his/her addiction can have a significant impact on your client's case.

When a client has a drug or alcohol problem:

Observe and record.

While you may have some local treatment sources, they are still no substitute for talking with addiction specialists who are trained to spot addiction and treat it. A qualified treatment center is trained specifically to pinpoint the type of addiction your client has and to find the proper program that will best suit his or her needs.

The ability to demonstrate to the court that your client is taking the proper steps to address his/her addiction can have a significant impact on your client's case. It can also prompt your client in initiating the changes necessary for recovery.

Enlist the help of an expert.

Once you've reached out to a treatment specialist, they will perform a detailed assessment. Then this person will work with your client, the probation officers, judges and even medical professionals to determine the right course of action.

The right program can not only cure your client of a serious addiction problem but can be a true demonstration to the court system that your client is willing to do what it takes to transform their lives which is the goal of every court.
